We sought to characterize the pathophysiology and outcomes of patients with acute kidney injury (AKI) requiring continuous renal replacement therapy (CRRT) and identify risk factors for mortality. We also sought to determine the in-hospital rate of asymptomatic AKI in patients with atrial fibrillation (AF). The National Patient Safety Foundation Clinical Outcomes Assessment Program database was queried for all patients receiving CRRT between 2001 and 2010. Demographics, comorbidities, signs and symptoms of underlying disease leading to the diagnosis of AKI, etiology, and indications for renal replacement therapy were recorded. Logistic regression was performed to identify factors associated with mortality. From 3304 patients receiving CRRT, 272 patients had AKI necessitating CRRT. In-hospital mortality rate was higher in the AKI group as compared to patients without AKI (45.8% vs. 34.6%, p = 0.008). Crude mortality rate decreased between 2001 and 2010 (61.5% vs. 43.9%, p = 0.008). AKI in patients with AF was present in 10.2% (25 of 246) of the AF cohort. AKI necessitating CRRT is associated with increased mortality. In-hospital rate of asymptomatic AKI in AF patients is high but not likely associated with higher in-hospital mortality.
